

Heritage

From the Editorial Desk

We continue our journey with the third volume of our academic journal Heritage. The journal covers a diverse range of subjects to cater to an eclectic readership. There are twenty eight articles from the Humanities, Social Sciences and Science disciplines. The current issue of Heritage is exceptionally suited to the needs of contemporary academic research and praxis, bringing together research articles that speak to present society and polity, take a critical look at historical constructions and discourses, make contribution to the field of fiscal policies, engage with the study of both flora and fauna, as well as human and medical sciences.

Interdisciplinarity has always been the hallmark of Heritage, this collates both classroom teaching and tools, and innovations in research methodologies. This also paves way for collaborative research, and several articles engage with each other across disciplinary boundaries, foregrounding their shared concern with human life, the environment and the social order. The present issue is also an intellectual reservoir of pertinent information, holistic approaches to research, creating synergy between different parts of the teaching/learning/research triad.
